Death Wears a Dress

Tania De Rozario
University of British Columbia, Canada/Writer, Canada & Singapore

Abstract

In many parts of Asia, female ghosts play an interesting role in how the supernatural is imagined and constructed. Whether she be the pontianak who waits for her victim by the side of the road, or the mother or lover who returns for revenge, the female ghost is often characterised as treading the line between agency and oppression. On one hand, she is an autonomous character who seeks justice on her own terms; on another, she is usually reduced to a victim of violence while she is alive, and her agency is only granted in death… in the transformation of her identity from victim to villain.

Death Wears a Dress is a collection of poems inspired by numerous female "monsters" central to Asian folklore, many of whom continue to reincarnate through horror films, pop culture and social media. Through poetic verse, I hope to centralise, re-imagine and humanise the experiences, emotions, desires, fears and regrets of these fictitious women in an effort to unearth possible insights about gender, power, longing and justice.

Death Wears A Dress is being written with the support of Singapore’s National Arts Council’s Creation Grant.

Keywords: poetry, tropical, gothic, Asia, female ghosts

DOI: http://dx.doi.org/10.25120/etropic.18.2.2019.3702
Appetite

Every object I see makes me hungry all over again. Don’t make me explain this emptiness: just feed me what you have, your moist meats ripening with age, your root vegetables dark with soil. I want to be buried in your leisurely lunches, champagne brunches, snacks snuck between munches, suppers slurped past midnight. Give me gravy trains of staple grains, the cookie that crumbles, the bigger fish to fry. The big cheese, the bread and butter, the bad eggs whose names you mutter. Pass me the hot potato, hard nut to crack, the souped-up smart cookies selling themselves like hotcakes. I want the bun in your oven, the apple of your eye, one woman’s meat and another’s poison, candy from a baby, then the baby itself, sweet-toothed and teething on the milk of human kindness. I want to make a meal of you, your calves soft like veal, want to butter you up then see if I feel any fuller after eating your heart out after making you my sweet and just desserts.

DOI: http://dx.doi.org/10.25120/etropic.18.2.2019.3702
On Losing One’s Head

In a former life, I’d get angry. My husband would say Don’t lose your head! In spite of indignation, some of that stuck, because now my head is all I am. Sure, other parts still linger neck down: heart, stomach, intestines, bits of skin… …it is the rest of myself I lose these day. Every time the sun sets, I rise above my grave, look down at stray limbs, digits, genitals, wondering whether every woman is doomed in life to lose bits of themselves to someone else, scour endlessly the flesh of other people for something that makes them whole.
Motherhood

This baby is the weight of a neutron star: impossible to cradle without breaking oneself. Could you hold her for a minute? Not so long, just until her gravity becomes your coffin, drags you down into the soil, finds you buried alongside us.

The sky is heavy with anxiety and rain.

No sacrifice is ever enough.