

Mary Dilworth

HOMELESS

In the alley,
in the warehouse doorway,
she is crouching.
And the wind's blowing.
It clatters the loose iron,
hammers a rhythm.
And it's no use thinking
of her own door,
slamming shut:
that certain room
with the frozen faces,
receding.