

BILL BEARD

SAM DIED.

I never knew you Sam.
Or your mother.
Only your great, round blue eyes . . . amid flute-filled fires of joy of nights in your presence
— the grin and gurgle
as Jane, your aunt,
held you, and bounced your six months on her knee.

Now, as I stand in the sun this Sunday morning, beside my camp fire in a dry creek bed, I hear the west wind gently touch a weeping willow tree; see an eagle fly high in blue sky: and remember yesterday's letter from Jane "Sam died. Sam died two days ago.
Oh Bill, it's unbelievable.
I feel so helpless . . ."

two tears trickle off my cheek, and I sing your eyes
into a far cathedral of the sun.

So long Sam: until
under other skies,
we may meet, full throatedly.

I sit, naked to the sun, and sharpen my tomahawk.

UNTITLED

I squat, or stand, in savannah tablelands, altering with the wind. A mantis smiles: there is slow movement in the leaves

. . . summer is heavy lidded, and the powerful owl empties his eyes — pray silently for those who laugh with the trees;

night is gliding near;
shadows of the pale sky echo their fear . . .

south coast, the sapphire coast lies quiescent, chanting only to the lonely cloud's neap tide song: but the eagle still rides the west wind; and a man there is seldom alone.

My feet lie dormant,
'neath off-coast hills.

Leaves fall, the half moon waned; dark hawks

go to ground, the season of fire is dwindling

: the cold is hard by . . .
